Anthracite Men Have Ten Demands to Make Upon the Operators.

WILKESBARRE, Pa., September 10. The tri-district union convention of the anthracite mine workers which is to formulate demands to be submitted to the operators in drawing up a new scale to take the place of the one that expires next April today received the report of the scale committee which was considering the demands. Debate on the report was immediately started. Some of the miners want the convenion to go on record in favor of a mininum wage before asking for a specific increase. It is claimed by them that the 20 per cent increase recomnended by the scale committee is not

THE EVENING STORY.

CHICKENS.

(Copyright, 1915, by W. Werner.)

Sarah Wing had been awakened at 3 clock by the crowing of the Griffin rooster. He had been joined immediately by the Hopkins rooster, and the two had kept up a lusty duet, to which all the other fowls in the neighborhood had added a lively chorus. Sarah was a thin, nervous little woman, and she had arisen from her bed tered by our neighbors' fowls when we keep none of our own," she said to her husband at breakfast. "I'm sick of it myself," Jonas replied.

By George, I'd move if I knew any good place to go." "Oh, we can't move," sighed Sarah. I suppose we'll just have to grin and sear it. But it does seem to me folks tre very inconsiderate sometimes. I'm ure, Jonas, I'd have too much feeling or my neighbors to keep anything so

"O, I hate to. I like Mrs. Griffin and Mrs. Hopkins both. They're the kind that would go off the handle at a word. It's never been said of me that I couldn't get along with my neighbors, and it never will be. You see how I'm situated."

"I see," said Jonas, and went whist-ling away to his day's work at painting and paperhanging.

An hour later, just as Sarah was sitting down to some sewing, her right-hand neighbor, Mrs. Griffin, came in. Mrs. Griffin was a high-colored woman, with black eyes and a sharp nose.

"Well, if you ain't the cosy lady!" she cried. "Sewing here at 8 o'clock, and all your work done up as neat as Carrying food to the chickens was not all she found that she had to do. That afternoon three of the fowls worked their way out of the pen, and Sarah toiled terribly for an hour before she could restore them to captivity. She was worn out when evening came. swered Mrs. Hopkins. "She's so terribly particular, not a bit like you. I'd sooner think of asking the mayor's wife, for all we're so friendly." She laughed. "You'll do it, won't you, Mrs. Wing?"

"Why, yes, I suppose I'll have to," Sarah answered, as ungraciously as she had ever spoken in her life.

However, Mrs. Hopkins was in no wise disturbed by her reluctance.

"IT'S THE CHICKENS, SALLY."

"IT'S THE CHICKENS, SALLY."

For two days Sarah carried feed and water conscientiously, and then she fell ill. The doctor came and ordered her to remain in bed. Mrs. Griffin having seen the doctor's car at the door, came in to see what was the matter.

"You aren't sick," she cried.

"I'm afraid I am—a little," smiled Sarah, faintly.

"What seems to be the matter?"

"Just heat and nerves, I guess. I don't sleep well." It seemed to Sarah that any reasonable woman would know why she had not slept. She sighed and went on, "You know Mrs. Hopkins left me to look after her chickens. Of course, I can't now, and Jonas can't; he knows nothing about fowls, and then he is too busy anyway. I guess I'll have to ask you to attend to them till Mrs. Hopkins gets back, Mrs. Griffin. Of coruse, you won't mind. You're such friends."

"I've got all I can do to see to my own fowls," replied Mrs. Griffin, Oftily.

"I know," murmured Sarah. "But "I know," murmured Sarah. "But you see how it is. Unless you take care of them I don't know who will."

A week passed, and Mrs. Hopkins did not return. One afternoon Jonas, who was having a half day at home, rushed in to where Sarah was sitting with a book. "Can you hear it?" he asked, with Collecting Tourist Loans.

By Frederic J. Haskin.

When the European war broke out he unusual conditions that were deeloped placed many American citizens who were traveling abroad in positions of financial embarrassment. necessary that those citizens be brought home, for their presence in war zones offered all sorts of complications. So incle Sam loaned them the money.

Now he is asking for its return. In fact, he has been asking somewhat urgently for a good while. He has six extra clerks officiating as collectors of the tourist fund, jogging delinquents, giving receipts for sums paid. While the old gentleman is inclined to be lenient with his nieces and nephews under the present circumstances, while he is philosophical and an optimist, insisting upon a belief that the general public is honest, the facts in this case are worrying him a bit, for not half the loans have been returned, and collections are slowing up all the time.

The government acted with great promptness in aid of its citizens a year ago. As soon as the need was known the tourist fund, jogging delinquents, giving receipts for sums paid. While the is philosophical and an optimist, insisting upon a belief that the general public is honest, the facts in this case are worrying him a bit, for not half the loans have been returned, and collections are slowing up all the time.

The government acted with great promptness in aid of its citizens a year ago. As soon as the need was known the United States treasurer was authorized by act of Congress to provide $2,500,000 to meet it. He was also authorized to serve as agent for private individuals who wanted to deposit money upon which friends or relatives abroad might draw. Soon there were more than 5,000 such deposits, aggregation $2,502,000, and the State Department was cabling abroad information as to whom it should be paid.

Not all this money was called for. Up to the lst of August about $1,500,000 of the funds received from private in dividuals had been paid to those for whom they were deposited. A part of the balance had been returned to the country before its arrival or could not be located. A considerable sum is yet to be accounted for by the different by the top accounted for by the different by the provided the service rendered, and the avoidance of possible complications.

It's all sixes and sevens. I hate to go away and leave it so, but—"
"Are you going away?"
"Tm going to Arles to see my sister. I'll be back tomorrow some time. Say, Mrs. Wing, I brought over a bucket of chicken feed and left it sitting in your woodshed. Just give it to the chickens tonight and tomorrow morning. I know you won't mind."

Just for a moment Sarah hesitated. She had taken care of her neighbors' chickens in their absence a good many times without so much as a word of thanks in return. Yet she never asked a similar favor, for she kept no chickens. Mrs. Hopkins and Mrs. Griffin were, as Jonas said. "thick as paste," yet neither ever asked the other to do a thing of this kind for her. It really looked as if between them they were making a doormat of Sarah. And yet in her desire to be at peace with her neighbors Sarah replied gently that she would look after the chickens.

Carrying food to the chickens was not ail she found that she had to do. That afternoon three of the fowly.

worked their way out of the pen, and Sarah toiled terribly for an hour before she could restore them to captivity. She was worn out when evening came. Mrs. Griffin did not return as she had promised, but stayed away another night. "I had a splendid time," she said, "and I knew there was nothing to worry about here. You'd look after the chickens."

Sarah said nothing, but she felt that she had been badly used.

Three days later Mrs. Hopkins came in. Mrs. Hopkins was stout and stolid. My daughter's sent for me to come. One of the children is sick," she panted. "Tm going to ask you to look after the chickens while I'm gone, Mrs. Wing. I don't know, of course, how long I'll be away. I shan't leave tilt the child's better. There's a sack of climax on the back porch where you can get to it handy. And you can throw in any table scraps you have. "Twon't make you much trouble and I'll be a thousand times obliged."

Sarah had been kept awake again by the roosters, and she was feeling far from well. She looked directly at Mrs. Hopkins as she said gently, "Mrs. Griffin has chickens and knows more about them than I do. Why didn't you ask her to look after your fowls?"

"Oh, I wouldn't for anything," an-

"Jonas!"
"And such a hair-pulling time you never saw as those women are having."
"Oh, Jonas, Mrs. Hopkins will blame me." walled Sarah.
"Not a bit. You see, I wrote her a postal saying you were sick and had to turn over the hens to Mrs. Griffin. I suspected something like this would happen. And the best of it is, Saily, they're both vowing that they work way and take their chickens with 'em."

Considerable loss has been experienced in the immediate exchange of American and German Through Exchange. The time of the war a German mark was valued at 24 cents of American money. To facilitate exchange, the relief agents gave it the value of a quarter of a dollar, so that the young music student in Berlin received but 4,000 marks instead of 4,166, which ordinarily would have been the equivalent for the $1,000. In later transactions the mark materially decreased in value, and is still depreciating, so that now it is only worth about 19 cents.

The handling of funds for private individuals, which continued from August of last year until May 6, 1915, added heavily to the work of the Treasury, yet these funds represented a much smaller sum than that which Uncle Sam took out of his own pocket to lend to those brought to unexpected a much smaller sum than that which Uncle Sam took out of his own pocket to lend to those brought to unexpected a much smaller sum than that which Uncle Sam took out of his own pocket to lend to those brought to unexpected a much smaller sum than that which Uncle Sam took out of his own pocket to lend to those brought to unexpected a more sum than that which upon a promissory note signed by the borrower, but with no other guarantee than his own personal honor.
